

Amy Fowler is a global health expert specializing in external relations, advocacy, and partnerships. She has spent much of her career with the U.S. Agency for International Development, including most recently managing USAID's response to COVID-19 in Europe. Prior to that, Amy led communications and advocacy for USAID's global maternal and child health and nutrition portfolio. She is deeply passionate about capturing and conveying impact and has had the great fortune of working with teams around the world to track and report on the impact of USAID's investments in health. Amy managed the production and distribution of USAID's maternal and child survival strategy, the annual Acting on the Call report, including developing a digital media hub of associated content. She has worked and traveled extensively throughout Africa, Europe, South America, and South Asia, and she is constantly looking for opportunities to bring new partners, resources, and ideas into the field of development. Amy has a BA from Duke University (Go Blue Devils!) and a Master in Public Administration from the Harvard Kennedy School.
